for the farmer.

Do Swine Require Salt?

This has been a mooted question with farmers and breeders for many years, and now remains as far from a satisfactory solution as when first started; some inclining to the affirmative opinion, and the large majority to a negative belief. The former contend that animals in a wild state neither require N E W or have access to it. This is a mistake; even in a wild state there are certain conditions of the animal economy, affecting the health and comfort, which the instinct of the brute creation teaches them how to counteract. Astringents, acids, alkalis, salts, &c., abounding in certain earths, plants and sprigs are sought for and duly appropriated by the animal. The wild beast is his own physician, Nature having endowops. This instinct, or all wise unseen power, the animal is in a great measure deprived of in a state of domesticity; he is solely and entirely the creature of man. subject to man's treatment, care and provision. His whole physical nature has unundergone a change; his appetites are not the same; his food is different, he is mated with different varieties of his species, and, wonderful metamorphisis in his confirmation. These facts will at once destroy the theory of those who are inclined to the negative side of the question just referred to. While all other domestic animals are regularly supplied with salt, the hog is general- and full jeweled. ly neglected. He requires, however, to be constantly supplied with it as are horses, cattle, or sheep, and suffers as much when deprived of it as either of these. His food is almost invariably given to him in a fresh piece to a full set. state, and to this fact we may attribute the presence of trichina and other diseases peculiar to swine, which seem to baffle the got up to order. Call and see sample book. most skillful treatment. If salt be not mixed with the food, it should constantly be kept in a separate trough in his sty, where access may be had whenever the animal feels inclined to lick or eat it. If farmers and breeders will try the latter plan, it will afford them a good opportunity of ascertaining whether or not the hog requires salt, and also whether it benefits his condition while when prepared for the table.

There is another simple method of testing the value of salt when given to swine. Let the farmer breed from a boar and sow fed on salt, and rear a litter to their full growth fattened in the ordinary way, and try the same experiment the same time with another set, never fed with salt, and let him note well the result. The former will be healthier, hardier, less subject to disease, fatter, better, and the meat will be sweeter and much more wholesome. If these considerations are worth anything to the farm er and breeder, they are worth, at least, an impartial investigation.
